Bio

Sean Coffey is a Practice Leader of the firm's Energy & Infrastructure and Environmental Practice Groups with over 20 years of experience in developing public-private partnerships — helping state and local governments build and modernize wastewater plants, educational facilities, schools, and energy and transportation infrastructure. Throughout his career, Sean has been known for his innovative thinking, consistently transforming ambitious ideas into practical solutions in both public and private sectors.

Sean collaborates with private developers, financial institutions, and government entities on a range of projects across Rhode Island, including hydropower, offshore wind energy, transportation facilities, and mixed-use developments. Many of these initiatives involve environmental representation, land use, and the redevelopment of brownfield sites.

In any new project, Sean focuses on understanding his client's objectives and the regulatory hurdles they may encounter. By aligning client goals with technical and financial strategies, he navigates environmental and permitting requirements to help projects progress smoothly. He describes himself as a “puzzle solver,” constantly energized by the challenge of finding innovative paths to success.

Outside of his legal practice, Sean is deeply committed to Rhode Island. He recently chaired the Rhode Island House of Representatives' Special Legislative P3 Commission, aimed at enhancing public infrastructure through private investment. His leadership extends to various organizations, having served as President of the Providence Preservation Society, Board Chairman of the United Way of Rhode Island, and a board member of Save the Bay, among others. His contributions have been widely recognized and include honors from organizations such as Common Cause, the ACLU of Rhode Island, and the Rhode Island Historic Preservation Commission.
